Collaborative Divorce - A Socially Responsible Way to Dissolving Your Marriage

Washington, DC (November 26, 2007)

Collaborative Divorce has been claimed as the kinder and gentler way to divorce. At the 8th Annual International Academy of Collaborative Professionals (IACP) Networking and Educational Forum in Toronto, Canada last month, a new claim emerged. Some collaborative professionals were beginning to agree that this could be a socially responsible way to divorce. Satya Artha Financial Advisor (www.satya-artha.com) works with divorcing couples to achieve balanced and responsible financial settlements through the collaborative process.

In the painful and confusing time of divorce, many couples have found an alternative way to the conventional divorce. Instead of falling into prolonged litigation procedures, often accompanied by destructive behaviors toward each other and their children, couples are opting to dissolve their marriages collaboratively. With the help of a team of collaboratively-trained professionals consisting of attorneys, coaches, a child specialist and a neutral financial professional, each aspect of the divorce is addressed separately but openly. The team helps the couple work through their legal, emotional, parenting and financial options, allowing for respectful, open and forward-looking resolutions.

Mimi Stansbury is a collaboratively-trained Certified Financial Planner (CFP®) and Certified Divorce Financial Analyst (CDFA™). She works with divorcing individuals, either directly, through their attorneys, or as part of a collaborative divorce team. She also works with individuals and small businesses in various tax and financial planning areas, including investment, retirement, estate, and business planning. Her comprehensive and balanced approach to financial planning is reflected in her firm's name - Satya Artha Financial Advisor. The name Satya Artha is derived from Sanskrit roots, meaning True Worth.
